The technology behind video editing is becoming more advanced and more affordable with the release of software applications. Most video editing software is designed to allow users to add special effects, such as colorization, for example. Some software can record directly to a DVD or a video file on a computer's hard drive. The reason for video editing is for the purpose of changing and creating videos. A video editor allows the user to add images and/or video, as well as text, music, transitions and more to produce a professional or even home movie. Video editing software is used for entertainment, education, marketing, and more. Video editing software can be found in desktop and laptop versions. Editors are designed to edit video files and are integrated into a computer's operating system or software. The most popular video editors in the United States are Adobe Premiere Elements, Final Cut Studio, Adobe Premiere Pro, and Avid Media Composer. Desktop video editing software includes various aspects of the software itself, as well as special plug-ins (add-ons), known as codecs or plugins, to add features that may not be found in the basic editor. There are two basic types of video editors for home use. The first is a stand-alone video editor, which does not integrate with other applications and the other is a "plug-in", which does integrate with other applications. Video editing software has become much more affordable and accessible in recent years. This is due to the advent of the computer and the Internet. Home editing software allows the user to add special effects to the original video file, such as removing the audio track, adding and moving video, or simply adding text overlays, graphics, or music tracks. It is similar to picture editing software in that it allows the user to edit the video and to add special effects to it. There are a wide variety of video editing software available, but the most popular are listed here. Video editing software is used to record, edit, and prepare video footage for a 82157476af
